

Journal of New

Librarianship

We are excited to announce the pending launch of the Journal of New Librarianship

This launch is the result of collaborative efforts among colleagues within the field of Library and Information Sciences.

There is a need to offer quality literature in our field in an open, independently produced journal. Beyond that, we believe that the library is meant to set an example for academia. Free and open access to information and innovation is crucial to the future of our institutions and profession. By providing an outlet that mixes both traditional and disruptive forms of scholarly and professional communication, we can change the way our profession shares and leads.

We are seeking volunteers to serve as editors, reviewers, and content providers.

We need experts to serve on our editorial board, to guide our process and to recruit new content.

We need reviewers to participate in our process by donating their time and insights.

We need content providers to keep our feed active, to submit their research and other output, their thoughts and ideas.

The Journal may include, but is not limited to:

Solicited articles; Peer-reviewed content; Essays; Experience and opinion pieces; Media (i.e., podcasts, video, etc) relevant to innovative practices in librarianship; Book reviews; Technology reviews; Letters to the Editor on topics relevant to the field; Data sets; Manifestos; Extended scholarship (Greater than 15,000 words); and Interviews.

International content will be welcome.

If you are interested please contact Steve Weiter, Dean of University Libraries at Oakland University at spweiter@oakland.edu.

We look forward to having you join us in this important and timely venture.
